DRAMATURGS NOTE

"The search was over!" celebrated actress Jane Fonda as her car radio blared Dolly Parton's "Two Doors Down." Fonda desperately wanted her in her upcoming film and reached out to offer a lead role. Parton accepted under the condition that she write the theme song. And so 9 to 5, the movie and the song, were under way.

These works wouldn't have been possible without the women that served as inspiration. Fonda's friend belonged to a women's group that fought against workplace sexism. In 1973, the women rallied against the mistreatment they experienced at work including unequal pay and sexual harassment. While originating in Massachusetts, chapters can be found in various states. Today, "9 to 5," is one of the largest organizations that addresses women's issues. They have aided in winning many civil rights cases, such as the 1978 Pregnancy Discrimination Act. Although the musical fictionalizes the tale of "folks like these," their struggles are rooted in the continuous battle for workplace equality.
